Google announces Stadia video-game service

Google's efforts to popularize games on virtual reality headsets stumbled.

Alphabet Inc.'s Google announced on Tuesday a browser-based video game streaming service dubbed Stadia that attempts to capitalize on the company's cloud technology and global network of data centers.

The technology allows users to play games through their internet browser without waiting for content to be downloaded to a device, making access to games potentially as easy as watching a video from YouTube. But Google for now offered scant details on pricing or available titles for the service, which faces potentially tough competition from game publishers and from rivals including Amazon.com and Microsoft.

The "waiting game will be a thing of the past," Phil Harrison, a Google vice president overseeing the new service, said during a keynote presentation on Tuesday in San Francisco at the Game Developers Conference, which is bringing together this week about 25,000 people who work in the video games industry.

Google said Stadia would launch sometime this year in the United States, Canada and much of Europe. REUTERS

Warren tests 2020 message with black voters in South

Sen. Elizabeth Warren was walking down a street in the town of Cleveland in the rural Mississippi Delta on Monday when she stopped to examine a small home's sagging roof. "You can be sure there's a lot of love in these homes. They just can't afford [to fix] it," state Sen. Willie Simmons told Warren during the Democratic presidential candidate's three-day campaign swing through Mississippi, Tennessee and Alabama. Affordable housing is a chief concern for the senator from Massachusetts, who recently reintroduced a $500 billion housing plan she says will create millions of housing units and reduce rental costs 10 percent. But the trip to the deep South, the first extended tour of the region by any of the more than dozen Democrats vying for the party's 2020 White House nomination, also gave Warren an opportunity to try to set herself apart from the field.

South Boston man charged with assault and battery

The Waltham Police 3 Department announced that the man wanted in connection with an assault and battery turned himself in on Tuesday following a manhunt and warnings of an "armed and dangerous suspect" on the loose on Monday. Waltham Police charged Darren Dyette, 29, of South Boston, with assault and battery with a shod foot, assault and battery for stomping a victim on the ground, strangulation, two counts of witness intimidation, assault and battery inside a home, and issuing murder threats. Boston Police had a warrant out for Dyette, and charged him with malicious destruction of property. CBS Boston reported that Dyette was seen around 5:30 a.m. in the area of Main Street and Bear Hill Road, when he ran from police officers. A State Police helicopter and K-9 officers responded to the area, but search was called off at about 9:30 a.m. NATE HOMAN

Students tied to admissions scam could face expulsion

The University of Southern California said it may expel students tied to a brazen U.S. college-admissions scam after reviewing their records, which could lead the college to throw out "Full House" actress Lori Loughlin's two daughters. The school said on Monday night it has already "placed holds on the accounts of students who may be associated with the alleged admissions scheme," preventing them from registering for classes or acquiring transcripts. "Following the review, we will take the proper action related to their status, up to revoking admission or expulsion," the college said in a tweet on Monday night. It did not name specific students, but Loughlin and her fashion designer husband Mossimo Giannulli are among 50 people charged last week with participating in what federal prosecutors called a $25 million bribery and fraud scam.

Pats owner Kraft can avoid prosecution in prostitution sting

Office of the State Attorney for Palm Beach County confirms plea deal was made to the New England Patriots owner for soliciting prostitution.

The owner of the Super Bowl champion New England Patriots could be spared prosecution on charges of soliciting prostitution in Florida if he agrees to community service and other obligations, a spokesman for prosecutors said on Tuesday.

Robert Kraft, the National Football League team owner, is receiving the same offer from the Office of the State Attorney for Palm Beach County as the other first-time misdemeanor offenders caught up in the case last month, said Mike Edmondson, CETTY IMAGES a spokesman for the office. Edmondson declined to say if Kraft has agreed to the offer for avoiding prosecution.

Kraft, 77, a businessman who built the Patriots into the NFL's most dominant franchise, was charged following a police sting targeting sex-trafficking in day spas and massage parlors. The operation has led to charges against hundreds of people.

An attorney for Kraft could not be reached for comment. A spokesman for the New England Patriots did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Prosecutors would defer prosecution of Kraft if he agrees to 100 hours of community service, receives education on the harms of prostitution, undergoes screening for sexually transmitted diseases and pays court costs, Edmondson said by phone.

Prosecutors also generally require defendants avoiding prosecution in such cases to admit guilt or acknowledge that prosecutors would prevail in the case at trial, he said.

Kraft is one of 25 people who were charged in Palm Beach County with soliciting prostitution, a charge with a maximum sentence of one year in jail if a person is convicted.

The New England Patriots play just outside Boston. Kraft lives in Massachusetts but owns property in Florida's wealthy Palm Beach, 80 miles north of downtown Miami.

Kraft is accused of visiting Orchids of Asia Day Spa in the Palm Beach County community of Jupiter on two separate occasions to solicit sex and was charged with two counts of soliciting prostitution.

Kraft, a friend and supporter of President Donald Trump, could face discipline from the NFL under a policy that applies to team owners and prohibits "conduct detrimental to the integrity" of the NFL.

In 2004, Indianapolis Colts owner Jim Irsay was suspended for six games and fined $500,000 after he pleaded guilty to driving while on drugs.

Kraft's wife of many decades, Myra Hiatt Kraft, died in 2011 of ovarian cancer. He has not remarried.

An inside look at life as a transplant surgeon

There are only a few jobs that can defy the laws of life and death. Transplant surgeons have the unique ability to take an organ or an appendage and have it come back to life after attaching it to a patient in need. We spoke with Joshua D. Mezrich, M.D., the author of "When Death Becomes Life: Notes from a Transplant Surgeon," about why got into the field and some of the unexpected things that have come with the job.

What made you want to become a transplant surgeon?

When I was growing up, my dad went back to medical school when I was in third grade. He would always kind of tell stories from med school at the dinner table. I think my brothers were sort of grossed out, but I loved them. That was one piece. Of course, I always loved Hawkeye Pierce from "M.A.S.H."! As I went through college, I took the sciences on the side. I majored in Russian but I didn't think I'd go into something with Russian as a career. I took all of the premeds on the side and always remained interested in science and medicine. When I entered med school, I didn't know anything about surgery and I never would have thought in a million years I'd go into surgery or transplant. But, I ended up loving my surgical rotation!

This almost sounds cliche, but it's a true story. My first day on surgery, I went in at like 5 a.m. I was just a crazy day. I found out I was on call which was a perfect preparation for my future life. I didn't eat or drink anything and I was in the O.R. all day. Then finally at midnight, my resident told me to go next door to this operation. When I went in, it turned out it was a kidney transplant. This older surgeon was doing the transplant. He had classical music playing and it was really calm and relaxed. When we reperfused the kidney and it turned pink in front of my eyes and urine just started spraying out on to my hands, I was just staring at it thinking, "I can't believe this works!"

I wondered what other organs can we do this for and could I ever do this?

I was really intrigued by the challenge and the mystery of it. I was very aware that someone had just died and this organ was coming back to life. It just struck me as truly remarkable.

In the book, you talk about how people are your puzzles. Is there a sense of gratification or panic in solving such a complex problem?

I try not to panic! I like to use the word "gratification" or the word I often use is "satisfying". I think surgery is too hard to be fun, but it is incredibly satisfying. I think everything about surgery is your brain. It's making good decisions and solving the puzzle. Some puzzles are simple with 50 pieces and some puzzles are a bit complex with hundreds or a thousand pieces. When it comes to doing operation, it really is about thinking through the puzzle, taking what the case gives you, and really focusing hard on what it is you're looking at. And if something doesn't look right, stepping back and rethinking it. It does involve a lot of pre-planning, but I'll take a good brain over a good set of hands any day of the week when it comes to looking for a surgeon.

I really do look at it like a puzzle. Lots of practice helps. Experience is critical but you just have to watch the signs and stay focused and try to stay positive. When things start going badly you have to find a way to stay strong and not panic. It kind of gets easier in the sense that you get more experienced, but it gets more humbling to because no matter how many years you have in you always find cases that are really challenging. When I'm operating, I'm not sitting there thinking, "Oh my god. This person has kids!" [laughs] You really are focused on solving that puzzle and doing it in the simplest way you

What are some of the most surprising aspects of the job?

To me, some of the most beautiful stuff has been my interactions with both the deceased donors families and the living donors. To me, it is so heroic and it's kind of like running into a burning building to save someone. On the deceased donors side, we fly out and get the organs, which is something most people don't realize. We meet with the donor families and when I first met my first family I thought it was going to be this uncomfortable experience because I'm this vulture coming to take apart their loved one. But that couldn't have been further from the truth. Usually there's a big group of people there. They're crying because they just lost this loved one, maybe unexpectedly. Yet, they hang on to every one of our words. They want to know what we're going to do. It ends up being this incredibly positive experience. It's a really incredible feeling. It makes you realize that this is a gift and our job is to make sure that the gift is given.

The living donors are some of the most incredible people you could meet. But, I think one of the real beauties of this is that in most illnesses the patient is really kind of suffering alone. While they'll have family around, the patient goes through it alone. The patient endures it alone, they take the tests alone, and ultimately, they can die alone. But in transplant, there is this opportunity for someone to step forward to say, "Let me bare this with you and take a little pain to help you get through this." I just think there is something really special about that. Being a part of that exchange is really one of the most gratifying parts about being in my field. PAT KING

Poppy apocalypse: Crowds descend on California city to see 'superbloom'

In Florida, even winter is packed full of moments of sunshine.

With more than 825 miles of beaches, thousands of spas and endless ways to enjoy nature's beauty, the Sunshine State is your perfect escape.

Spring has arrived in Southern California and with it a crisis has blossomed in the small city of Lake Elsinore, where tens of thousands of visitors have flocked to see a "superbloom" of poppies in a desert canyon.

The rare profusion of orange poppies in Walker Canyon, set in the Temescal Mountains and accessible on foot via a trail. owes thanks to aboveaverage rainfall in the arid region. The profusion of tourists in Lake Elsinore, located about 70 miles southeast of downtown Los Angeles, apparently owes thanks to the popularity of Instagram.

The hashtag #superbloom had been used more than 100,000 times on Instagram by Monday.

The city of 63,300 has seen 50,000 tourists from around the country and as far away as Europe come to the 3.5-mile trail in Walker Canyon over the last two weeks to take in the orange flowers carpeting the surrounding hills.

The crowds have been so overwhelming that the city of Lake Elsinore shut Walker Canyon for a day to staunch the tourist flood and declared a public safety crisis. The city reopened Walker Canyon on Monday.

"This year's is substantially larger than we've ever seen in terms of the numbers of flowers and the numbers of visitors," Lake Elsinore City Hall spokeswoman Nicole Dailey said. The previous superbloom occurred in 2017.

The droves of people who started coming earlier this month prompted the city to start a shuttle service to Walker Canyon to ease traffic. This past weekend, tourists began lining up for the shuttle at 5:30 a.m., Dailey said, and wait times rose to two hours.

Some local residents have expressed outrage at the crowds and resulting gridlock, dubbing the superbloom season the "Poppy Apocalypse." The hashtags #PoppyNightmare and #IsitOverYet have also popped up on social media.

"We know it has been miserable and has caused unnecessary hardships for our entire community," a posting on the city's Facebook page on Sunday said.

Lake Elsinore Mayor Steve Manos wrote on Facebook on Saturday that a city employee was struck by a hit-and-run driver at the site, and a tourist was bitten by a rattlesnake.

Lake Elsinore has enlisted the help of the California Highway Patrol, the county sheriff's office, neighboring cities and private contractors to manage traffic around Walker Canyon, which has no designated public parking.

Rain in the forecast this week might deter some tourists from coming-or it could cause even more poppies to bloom and attract even more tourists. Dailey said she hoped wet weather would bring some relief for locals.

"We did not expect the crowds that we saw," she said. "Our freeways and our cities are not designed for crowds that you see in L.A." GABRIELLA BORTER

Robots compete with child jockeys in Egyptian camel races

Remote-controlled robot jockeys lined up at a major camel-racing festival in northeastern Egypt, as owners came under pressure from campaigns to stop using child riders.

Organizers fielded around 20 robots-childsize devices with a whipping arm that can be triggered at a distancealongside dozens of real children as part of a trial

"God willing, in a year, there will be no human jockeys, except for some adults for the sake of tradition," said EidHamdan Hassan, head of the Egyptian Camel Federation, which organized the festival in the Sarabium desert of Ismailia.

Several Gulf countries have banned child jockeys from the traditional Bedouin sport after rights groups said the youngsters were often injured and some had been abducted or sold by their families.

Owners at last week's Egyptian event said the bans had prevented them from fielding teams in Gulf festivalsand they hoped the move to robots would help them get in.

Esam el-Din Atiyah, president of the African Camel RacingFederation, which includes Egypt, acknowledged that child riders were sometimes injured. "Human rights organizations have said that this is child exploitation," he said.

He personally wanted Egypt to move to robotonly events, but the transition was costly and would take time, he added.

Young jockeys at the event-local children mostly aged 6-13-defended the tradition and their participation.

Sayed Mohamed, 11, said children were better than robots at steering.

"The camel might lean sideways. We [the children] are better at riding leaning camels so that we can straighten its route.

"The robot works well with camels that don't tend to lean."

Around 150 camels competed in eight categories over distances from five to 15 km, cheered on by more than 1,000spectators.

Local tribes prepare their best camels with a special diet of beans, barley, date paste and milk.

Victory raises camel's value. "When a camel wins, you sell it for a good price - from 150,000 to 200,000 Egyptian pounds ($8,700-$11,600)," said camel owner Mohamed Mostafa. "The camel that doesn't win is sold for only 10,000." AMR DALSH

More Rosen to Pats buzz

NFL.com's Daniel Jeremiah added fuel to the Josh Rosen-to-the-Patriots rumors this week, writing the following.

"I could make a strong argument that the Redskins should do everything in their power to acquire Rosen because I believe he's better than any QB who will be available at Pick No. 15 in Round 1. However, the other team I would keep an eye on is New England," Jeremiah wrote. "Not only would the Patriots land an heir apparent for Tom Brady, but they love a good deal and Rosen offers tremendous value for a young quarterback in terms of the money attached to his contract (he has three years and $6.2 million remaining on his rookie deal). Plus, they have an ample amount of draft capital (12 total picks, tied for the most of any team). In my opinion, Rosen is worth the Patriots' first round pick (32nd overall)."

Rosen is said to be on the block because of new Arizona coach Kliff Kingsbury's interest in drafting Oklahoma quarterback Kyler Murray with the first overall pick.
